Biltlang was a tiny village of about fifty houses. A section of the Indian army landed there under the command of a Major. The people there had done nothing offensive, and there was not a single MNF member in the village. The village council president told them these facts. But the Major and his soldiers were in a mood for action. They had tasted blood before, dealing with a village where armed underground men had taken shelter, and thirsted for more. They tortured six men to death and burned the houses. And they marched on towards Bakla, the next village.

As they entered Bakla, they were greeted by Rohlupuia, a young pastor. The news of what this group of army men had done in Biltlang had not yet reached him. Thus he was hopeful of speaking peaceably with them, assuming they had human hearts. The pastor had just returned from doing the rounds of his pastorate, encouraging and comforting his flock. He invited the Major to visit his home. He came in with seven of his men. The pastor served his visitors tea and requested them not to harm innocent people. As they were leaving, he walked out of the house with them to see them off.

All of a sudden, the Major turned and said, "We're going to burn your house. If you wish to take out your belongings, do it now."

The pastor went in. The Major shot him from the back and he fell down. While he was writhing on the floor, the men set his house on fire with him inside.

All the inhabitants of Biltlang and Bakla fled. Most of the young men in both the villages decided to join the MNF or to help them in every way they could. They had seen that being neutral did not guarantee safety from army activity.
